Excerpt: . . . this to be an executory contract of sale, with a collateral warranty as to quality, and, therefore, that the purchaser might retain and use the article after discovery of the defect and recover damages for breach of warranty. In Kent v. Friedman (i) it was held that a contract of sale of tobacco, with a representation that it was equal to a sample shown, and was good and sound, constituted an executory sale, with a collateral warranty. This warranty survived an acceptance after an opportunity to examine, and the purchaser was not precluded from recovering damages while retaining the goods. In Carleton v. Lombard (2) the opinion announces a present tendency to regard certain terms rather as part of the description of articles to be delivered under executory contracts, than as constituting a collateral obligation of warranty. In speaking of the possibility of the existence...
