The whole confusion on this point has arisen from not observing to what subdivision of the nervous system the first symptoms belong. I quite agree with Dr. Mcrriman in condemning, as useless, or rather as injurious, the indiscriminate and lavish detraction of blood. 857. The proper mode of treatment comprises the remedies--1. Against the attacks. 2. In the attacks, and in the threatening of the attack. 3. Against their effects. 858. The remedies against the attacks, or the prevention, consists in avoiding all the exciting causes: dental, gastric, intestinal irritation; passion; vexation; disturbance; interrupted sleep, c. 859. The remedies in the threatening of attacks consist in the watchful and prompt repetition of the same treatment; lancing the gums, relieving the stomach and the bowels. The sleep...
