Excerpt: . . . barren palm yield a considerable profit by their leaves, which are used for the processions and decorations of Palm Sunday. The trees from which the supply is taken are bound up to keep the leaves white. Vines, pomegranates, madder and green crops are cultivated below the palms: the whole is irrigated by the copious streams of the Vinalopo river, and the artificial lake situated 3 m. off. Elche supplies palms to Barcelona, Alicante, and other towns. The ancient Roman house of the Marquis of Lendines has a very large t Tho Moors made use of the male dust long before Linnjeus discovered the sex of plants. The custom is still followed in Elche of depositing the pollen artificially on the female palms. Moorish media tuna let into its wall. The marquis is pleased to show to visitors his collection of coins and other antiquities,...
